Welcome to this centenary history of Open Minds.

We were formed as the Queensland Wattle Day League in 1912 and have been part of the fabric of Brisbane ever since.

Today we are a leading non-profit organisation providing community based support services to people living with mental illness, disability and acquired brain injury.

Over the last hundred years we have changed and developed while our city has transformed and grown. Our story is about many things, but most of all it is about growing with Brisbane.

As we approached our centenary, the Board of Open Minds initiated a project to research our history. What we discovered is a fascinating story of the growth and development of our organisation that coincides with the growth and development of our city, and our strong association with the golden wattle which is part of the Australian coat of arms.

Founded as the Queensland Wattle Day League, we first funded art scholarships then helped soldiers returning from World War One. After funding further scholarships, the organisation reinvented itself as a membership group to help disabled people. A workshop was run for 20 years before we became more focussed on mental health services and changed our name to Open Minds.

Along the way, we were helped by some prominent Brisbane people including Governors, Ministers and Mayors. But it is ordinary people who have ensured the organisation is still here to celebrate this important anniversary. The various Board members, staff, clients, family, funders and volunteers who shaped the Wattle League represent a group of remarkable people. Some of whom overcame significant challenges to make their contribution.

Our centenary is a chance to celebrate all that we have achieved, and is also a time to reflect on the challenges that our clients still face in establishing a life of choice, fulfilment and participation.

We began as the Wattle League and one of the characteristics of wattle is its capacity for resilience and regrowth. The history document you hold shows the resilience and regrowth of both this organisation and those with whom we work.

I am confident Open Minds will keep growing as it enters its second century of service.

Mike Gilmour Chair of Open Minds

The emergence of the Wattle Day Leagues

Before Federation in 1901, Australian patriotism was growing. It was noted that other countries had a flower or plant as their national symbol – England had its rose, Scotland had the thistle and Canada had recently adopted the maple leaf.

The emergence of wattle as Australia's emblem was initially championed by those interested in botany and nature. In 1899, a "Wattle Club" was formed in Victoria by naturalist, Mr Archibald James Campbell. For several years, the club organised bush outings on the 1st of September, the first day of spring.

In 1908, Campbell gave a talk in Melbourne and advocated honouring Wattle Day on that day each year. A Sydney Wattle Day League was created in 1909, and the following year saw the formation of Wattle Day Leagues in South Australia and Victoria. A Queensland League was created in 1912.

Wattle Day became an annual event, and wattle increased its connection with nationhood during World War One. By World War Two, most Leagues had run their course. They did, however, leave a lasting legacy. Today, the wattle tree and its colours of green and gold are recognised as symbols of Australia – both officially and in popular culture and sport.

An early success was enjoyed with the addition of wattle on the

Wattle gained support as national flower for a number of reasons. Firstly, it was recognised as being present and prominent throughout Australia. Also, the bark was important commercially at the time as it was used in tanning processes. Perhaps most significantly, its flowering was seen as a sign of spring.

A Wattle League for Queensland in 1912

As Wattle Leagues were formed and captured the public imagination in other parts of Australia, a group of individuals and organisations decided to set up a Queensland version.

Mrs Josephine Papi is recognised as leading moves to mark Wattle Day in Queensland. Under her leadership, a meeting was held in the Town Hall on 4 October 1912. It was agreed that a Queensland branch of the Wattle Day League should be formed and money raised for the establishment of an arts scholarship. A public meeting was held on Monday 21 October which saw the official inauguration of the Queensland Wattle Day League.

The first Wattle Day in Queensland was held the following year on Saturday 16 August 1913. Volunteers collected and sold sprigs of wattle and badges at stalls mostly around Brisbane's inner city. Altogether, 15,000 badges were sold and £157 was raised.

Art scholarships

In 1913, the League invited submissions for its inaugural scholarship which would be judged at the Royal Academy in London. Five entrants were considered for the prize which was ultimately awarded in 1914 to sculptor, Daphne Mayo. The scholarship provided for study in London, however the onset of World War One intervened and plans to send Mayo overseas were put on hold. She finally left in 1919 and, as we will see later, enjoyed a highly successful career.

"The League is also anxious to have a large Queensland membership roll ... the chief efforts of its labours is that on one day in every year all people, rich and poor, shall proclaim themselves Australians and Australian Britons, and wear on that day the golden wattle as their emblem."

Brisbane in 1912

Brisbane was a very different place when the League was formed in 1912. In fact, the Brisbane boundaries of today were not created until 1925 when Greater Brisbane Council was established.

Before then, Brisbane and South Brisbane were separate authorities and many of the areas we know as suburbs were separate towns or shires including Windsor, Hamilton, Toowong, Coorparoo, Kedron and Stephens (which included Annerley, Yeronga and Greenslopes). Only the Victoria and Albert Bridges crossed the river, and the population was just 139,480 (1911 census).

Brisbane general strike

After months of simmering trouble, the general strike began in 1912 when members of the Australian Tramway Association were dismissed after wearing union badges to work. The Railways Union went out in sympathy and eventually over 40 unions had joined the action.

During the protests, 25,000 workers marched from Trades Hall to Fortitude Valley while 50,000 watched. Police Commissioner William Cahill refused a permit for a further march on Friday 2 February. Despite this, 15,000 people gathered at Market Square and were charged at by police with batons.

The police action against peaceful protestors, many of them women and children on the footpath, was widely condemned and the event became known as “Baton Friday” and later “Black Friday”.

The Wattle League during the First World War

As the terrible impact of World War One became apparent, it was impossible for the League to ignore the plight of those returning from the conflict.

The League began raising war relief funds. In particular, they funded artificial limbs for injured soldiers who had to pay for limbs themselves. The compounded effects of injury, loss of income and additional medical expenses took a heavy toll on servicemen and their families, making buying a limb very difficult.

After sufficient funds were raised to provide limbs, it was agreed to fund a specialised Orthopaedic Unit at the Rosemount Military Hospital in Windsor. This task was aided by a decision by Federal Government in 1918 to fully fund replacement limbs, allowing the remaining balance of the artificial limb fund to be used for the hospital.

The new hospital was opened in October 1919, and provided a much needed rehabilitation facility for soldiers with a wide variety of injuries. The League continued to raise money for former soldiers and the upkeep of the hospital for quite some time after the end of the war.

In some ways, the League suffered from being taken off course from its original objectives by the war. From another point of view though, it was the war that made the League. Its patriotic message about wattle and nationhood chimed with the mood of the country at the time, and moved the League into a much more central position in the hearts and minds of Queenslanders.

"Australia has become a nation, she has had her baptism of blood and tears, and she, too, has her national emblem, the golden wattle blossom. It has been wisely chosen. It is indigenous to Australia, growing freely in every State. It is beloved by children as well as adults. It is attractive, fragrant, vigorous, free growing, useful and valuable commercially, and so expresses elementally the spirit of our national life."

Rosemount Hospital, Brisbane

The First World War resulted in many injured soldiers returning to Brisbane in need of treatment and rehabilitation. A large repatriation hospital was established in Windsor on the site of a former private home and, as we saw on the previous page, the Wattle League assisted by funding an Orthopaedic Ward at the facility. The original residence where the hospital was built dates from 1859, although a new brick residence that remains today was built shortly after this.

The property was initially lent to the Defence Department in World War One to be used as a hospital. New buildings were added in the grounds as additional wards and it was formally acquired by the government in 1926.

Rosemount continued in service as a military hospital right through and after World War Two, until Greenslopes Hospital became the main repatriation hospital in the 1950s. The Rosemount facility then became linked to the Royal Brisbane Hospital and provided geriatric and psychiatric support until the 1990s. Many of the added hospital buildings have gone, but from 2005 the main building has hosted a hospice.

The ward funded by the League was opened in October 1919. A newspaper report on a tour given to Wattle League members at the time gives a sense of the treatments in operation:

“The visitors were shown the needle baths, hot and cold baths, and whirlpool baths where the water is agitated and strikes against the limbs of the patient. Hot air and electricity are also a part of the treatment.”

They also saw the gymnasium, described as a:

“big room fitted with all sorts of gymnastic apparatus for very gently developing stiff limbs. Particularly interesting were the ingeniously devised machines for gradually rendering more flexible stiff knees, or ankles, or wrists that would not work easily. In order to demonstrate a patient sat in a chair fitted with elaborate metal parts. His thighs were held down fast by a portion of chain, and his ankles were put into stocks, so to speak, while, by turning a handle with his arm, he was able to gently exercise a stiff knee.”

The Wattle League scholarships

The work of the League from 1914 was marked by tension between the desire to assist returning soldiers from two world wars and the original aim of providing scholarships. In the end, the League enjoyed success on both fronts. It assisted many former soldiers but also helped launch the careers of a number of significant Queenslanders.

Daphne Mayo

Due to the war, Daphne Mayo had to wait five years between winning her scholarship and finally departing for England in August 1919. She enrolled in the Royal Academy of Arts in London, where she won much praise and a number of awards. This success was enjoyed at a time when female sculptors and, indeed, successful Queensland artists were a rarity. As part of the conditions of her scholarship, Mayo sent work back to the League in Brisbane. These were displayed in the city and subsequently handed over to the Queensland Art Gallery.

Mayo's success was a source of huge pride for Queensland and Australia. The Mercury (a Hobart newspaper) summed up this feeling in an article on 5 February 1924:

"In England, where competition is keen, and the population is so huge, it is only the first-rate people who become well known. This is chiefly why we have a justifiable feeling of pride when we hear of Australians distinguishing themselves on the other side of the world. It is interesting, therefore, to hear of the successful career of a young Queensland girl"

On her return to Brisbane, a new City Hall was under construction. There was nobody better qualified in Queensland to take on the decorative Tympanum envisaged for the building. Mayo continued her career with a number of public commissions and private creations. In later years, she moved to Sydney but her final major public work was in Brisbane in 1964 when she completed the sculpture of Sir Thomas William Glasgow in Post Office Square.

The Wattle League scholarships

In addition to her artistic works, Mayo was a tireless advocate for the arts and received an OBE in 1959. Mayo effectively retired from public life in 1973, before her death in Brisbane in 1982. Her work and her passion for the arts are still highly regarded, and Mayo was the subject of a major exhibition at Queensland Art Gallery in 2011.

Robert Percy Cummings

By 1924, the League was able to offer a second scholarship, which was won by Robert Percy Cummings enabling him to study for three years at the Architectural Association School in London. In 1927, he was awarded the Rome Scholarship in Architecture, and resided for two years at the British School in Rome, prior to working in London.

Cummings returned to Brisbane towards the end of 1930 and was later appointed Director of Architecture at the Central Technical College. He also worked in private practice as a partner in Lucas and Cummings. Their commissions included the First Church of Christ (North Quay) in 1939 and extensions to the Binna Burra Lodge in Lamington National Park.

Much of Cummings' later career took place at The University of Queensland, where he was Professor of Architecture from 1949.

The Wattle League scholarships

Further scholarships

Following Cummings' success, there was pressure for a third travelling scholarship but this never materialised. The Great Depression of the late twenties made fundraising difficult and also affected returned servicemen badly, meaning scholarship funds were directed to assist former soldiers.

Eventually, it became clear that the League would have to make do with a scholarship for study within Australia. Therefore, in 1936 the League introduced a new £50 arts scholarship in conjunction with the Queensland Technical College.

The following were awarded scholarships:

- ✿ 1937 & 38: Mr Wyclif Huston
- ✿ 1939: Miss Betty Quelhurst
- ✿ 1940: Miss Barbara Abbott Cottam
- ✿ 1941: Miss Marie Ethel Young
- ✿ 1942: Miss Jacqueline Boxall

At least two of these recipients enjoyed success in the arts. Wyclif Huston won the Philip Muskett Prize twice (awarded by the director of the National Art Gallery). Also, Betty Quelhurst emerged as an art teacher and prominent artist. In 2000, she was featured in an exhibition at Queensland Art Gallery and at the Gold Coast City Art Gallery the following year.

City Hall construction

Built between 1920 and 1930, City Hall was once the tallest building in Brisbane. The site was chosen despite it being a swamp, mainly because it was largely council-owned land. Foundations had to go down 54 feet before reaching bedrock and a workman drowned during construction.

At the time, City Hall was one of the most expensive buildings in Australia, costing £1 million. As well as housing Council offices, it has hosted many famous guests and events including The Rolling Stones and Queen Elizabeth II.

The Tympanum was designed and carved by Wattle League scholarship winner, Daphne Mayo, and depicts European settlement in Queensland. It took more than two years to carve on site, during which time Mayo occupied a rooftop studio and even slept there some nights.

The Tympanum was the last part of City Hall to be completed and the scaffolding can still be seen here. When King George Square was extended in the 1970s, the area was levelled, resulting in the removal of the original stone stairs that can be seen in front of the building.

Wattle Day

From 1913 to the early 1940s, most of the fundraising activity for the League focussed on Wattle Day. Stalls were set up across the city and lady collectors offered sprigs of wattle or badges in return for a donation. Items such as flags, badges, sweets, souvenirs and fruit were also sold from the stalls.

Early collections were enhanced with car processions and prizes for the most effectively decorated cars. Wattle Day was quickly established in the minds of Queenslanders, and the decision to support returned soldiers during the First World War ensured a patriotic response. In later years, schools became central to the event, and by the mid twenties, income from schools had overtaken the takings from street collections.

A combination of ageing League membership, poor economic conditions and simply changes in society saw Wattle Day decline in popularity. By 1939, it was noted in the Courier Mail that no street collections were planned.

By that time though, the wattle and its green and gold colours had firmly implanted themselves in the minds of Australians. The day itself has also made a return in recent years and in 1992, the first of September was declared Wattle Day in a proclamation by the Governor-General.

The decline of Wattle Day was the subject of comment in The Advertiser (SA) in 1939. In the very year that World War Two began, the writer commented:

“Wattle Day as one of our outward institutions has disappeared. Maybe the big national days born of the Great War have overshadowed it. Or perhaps Australians are too prone to take their country and its emblems for granted. That is not a comforting thought in days when the swastika and other symbols are being venerated almost to adoration in other parts of the world.”

Wattle Day

Wattle Day in schools

Later Wattle Days saw efforts focussed more exclusively on schools and combined fundraising and promotion of the wattle to pupils. At its peak, 120,000 Wattle badges were ordered for the annual fundraising efforts, with over 100,000 of those going to schools. School children tended to donate one penny on Wattle Day and lessons were geared toward promoting the study of nature.

Brookfield History Society, as part of their own research, recorded lifetime resident, Edith Smith talking about Wattle Day when Upper Brookfield was still a farming community in the 1930s. She said:

"There was always Wattle Day, when the wattles came out. The wattle flower and that; that was always a special day. It was always mentioned at school and you always took sprays of wattle to school to give to one another."

Wattle Day in schools carried on for a little longer than the street collections, even featuring on the front page of the Courier Mail in 1939.

Wattle Day

Wattle Day outside Brisbane

Although Wattle Day was focussed on Brisbane, efforts were made to encourage other Queensland towns to take part. This met with varying degrees of success, but did see Wattle Day activities replicated in a number of areas over the years. A long lasting variant of the League operated in Rockhampton and donated money to what is now the RSPCA. That appears to be the only area in Queensland where a Wattle League operated for more than a few years.

Between 1914 and 1916, Wattle Day activities were reported in many country towns including Gatton, Toowoomba, Bundaberg, Crow's Nest, Maryborough, Marburg, Beenleigh, Charleville, Wynnum, Warwick, Toogoolawah and Mount Morgan.

In 1917 Mrs Williams, Vice President of the League, visited Cairns to encourage participation. Another 'tour' in 1922 saw Secretary Mrs Campbell travel with Mrs Williams to establish branches at Mount Morgan, Rockhampton, Bundaberg and Kingaroy. The Women's Auxiliary of the Returned Soldiers and Sailors League in Maryborough agreed to act as a branch. Goomeri was also visited, where a branch had already been formed.

In the end though, it was really the schools activity that ensured a Queensland-wide reach for the League. Support from the Education Department meant all schools were encouraged to participate and lessons were devoted to nature and nationhood. Pupils also gave a donation for a badge and this became a vital source of income for the League.

“Wattle Day, perhaps more than any other festival, is the one which makes a strong and direct appeal to patriotic sentiment, not only because of the associations which are brought to mind by the fragrant little flower which grows in luxuriance and variety in nearly every part of our island continent, but also because of the fine record of achievement which has been established by the Wattle Day League in collecting funds for commendable purposes.”

Brisbane Courier, 1922

The Great Depression

The Wall Street crash in October 1929 is traditionally seen as the beginning of the severe depression that affected the whole industrialised world. In fact, Australian unemployment was already at 10% before the crash but reached a peak in mid-1932 when almost 32% of Australians were out of work.

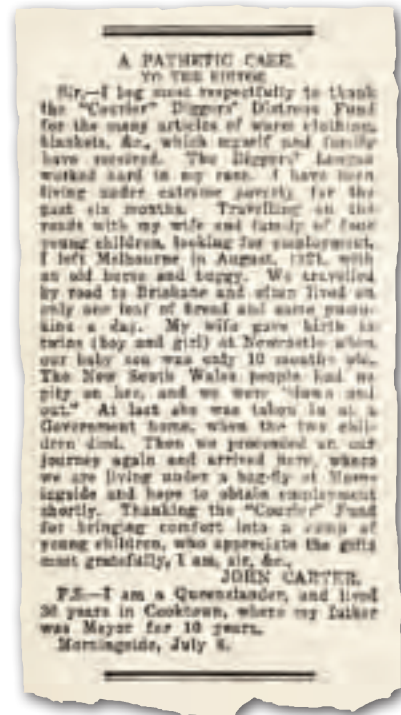

The impact on Australia was devastating. Many people lost their homes and were forced to live in makeshift dwellings. The resulting tensions led to political and social instability.

At the time, the Federal Government did not have a centralised unemployment assistance program, meaning those affected had to rely on relief from charities and uncoordinated government agencies. Public works projects were initiated to provide employment – usually involving manual labour like road building. Perhaps the most significant such project in Brisbane was the Story Bridge.

For the League, the impact on fundraising was stark, as Wattle Day income went from £1,100 in 1922 to just over £70 in 1930. The recession hit the poorest and the disabled hardest, meaning that injured former soldiers faced unimaginable difficulties. The League could not ignore their needs and could not justify funding art scholarships in the face of such need.

▲ The post-war years were hard for many former soldiers, as this letter to the Courier in 1922 shows.

◀ Yeronga Unemployment Camp pictured in 1926. Unable to pay their rent or mortgage, the only alternative for hundreds of people during the Great Depression was to set up a makeshift home in an unemployment camp. Many travelled across Australia looking for work.

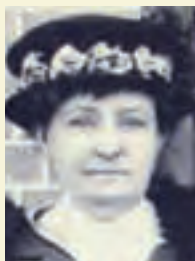

The Story Bridge was constructed between 1935 and 1940. The work provided years of employment for many men, as one of the governments' public works projects designed to ease the effects of the depression. It was named after John Douglas Story, a public servant who had advocated strongly for the construction of the bridge.

Other public works projects at the time included the Somerset Dam, the Hornibrook Bridge, the deep water harbour at Mackay and the University of Queensland's new site at St Lucia.

The people behind the League

Mrs Josephine Papi

Mrs Josephine Papi was the first Secretary of the Queensland Wattle Day League and is recognised as the driving force behind the establishment of a Wattle League in Queensland. She remained active in the organisation until shortly before her death in 1925.

The Papi family were prominent in Brisbane – Josephine was married to Dr Fernando Cantu Papi, who was a teacher and school inspector. Both were strongly community minded and Mrs Papi, in particular, was noted for her philanthropic work.

Before establishing the League, she was an enthusiastic fundraiser during the Boer War, raising money for the Brisbane Industrial Home and organising the first fancy dress ball for the Brisbane Children's Hospital.

She founded the South Brisbane Croquet Club in 1902, and the former South Brisbane croquet headquarters on Cordelia Street was named 'Josephine Papi House'.

Mrs Marie Campbell

Marie Campbell was born in Denmark and arrived in Australia at the age of seven. She served as Wattle League Secretary for over 15 years and was the central figure in the organisation of Wattle Day; her collecting teams were regularly the most successful. As well as the League, Mrs Campbell worked for many other good causes and received a King George V Silver Jubilee Medal for her services.

Not only was Mrs Campbell central to the formation and early success of the League, she also played a vital role in the transition to a revived League in the 1950s, as we will shortly see.

She died at the age of 84 in 1954.

The people behind the League

Mary & George Marchant

Mary Marchant was an active Vice President of the Wattle League. She was married to businessman and philanthropist, George Marchant.

Together, they bought a ginger beer manufacturing business and invented a successful new bottling machine. A feature of their management was their care of the employees, with whom they shared the profits.

In 1899, they purchased the 100 acre paddock that is today's Marchant Park. When the Rev. Wheller was planning a garden settlement at Chermside, George donated 25 acres and £12,000. The family also gave $82,000 to build the Prohibition League's Canberra hotel in inner-city Brisbane and supported the Queensland Society for Crippled Children by donating their home, Montrose in Taringa.

Mary died unexpectedly of a brain haemorrhage in December 1925. After George died in 1941, the remainder of their fortune was distributed among many charities.

Thanks to Chermside and Districts Historical Society for this information.

Mrs J Williams

A name that appears regularly on the list of Wattle League office bearers is Mrs J Williams. She was a Vice President of the League from the start in 1912 and remained a Life President until 1944.

She was noted as an active temperance worker and represented the Women's Christian Temperance Union on the National Council of Women. She was also President and a Vice President of the National Council of Women and a member of the Brisbane Women's Club.

Mrs Williams was one of the first women to advocate the appointment of female Justices of the Peace, so it is fitting that she herself was appointed a JP in 1931.

The people behind the League

Mr John Frederick Bailey (President 1912–1917)

John Bailey chaired the 1912 public meeting that inaugurated the Queensland Wattle Day League, where he was elected as the first President. At the time, Bailey held a dual role as Government Botanist and Director of the Brisbane Botanic Gardens. He later went on to be Director of the Adelaide Botanic Gardens.

Bailey's family already had a long association with botany in Australia. His grandfather was the first colonial botanist in South Australia, while his father was colonial botanist for Queensland.

Mr George Kenilworth Seabrook (President 1917–1920)

Elected in 1917 to succeed the first president Mr Bailey, G K Seabrook resigned due to “pressures of business” in 1920, but remained listed on the League Committee as a Lifetime Vice President until at least 1941. He was President of the League during the time it funded the Orthopaedic Ward at Rosemount Military Hospital.

Seabrook worked as an auditor and accountant at the Queensland Deposit Bank and Building Society. He also served as General Secretary of the Queensland Australian Natives Association.

Alderman Maurice Baldwin (President 1920–1928)

Maurice Baldwin was President of the League between 1920 and his death in 1928. He was born in Brisbane in 1869 and was heavily associated with sport for much of his life. Baldwin played a prominent role in Rugby Union after his appointment as General Secretary of the Queensland Rugby Union in 1901.

Outside of sport, he was Secretary of the farewell and return committee for Queensland troops that fought in the Boer War and was elected to Hamilton Town Council in 1915.

The people behind the League

Mr Samuel Henry Richardson OBE (President 1928–1931 & 1935–1944)

Samuel Richardson was elected President of the Wattle League on two separate occasions. He helped to found The Sailors' and Soldiers' Fathers' Association in 1918 and served as Honorary Secretary (later President) for over 20 years. The group was usually known as the Father's Association, with Richardson himself affectionately referred to as "dad". A press report states that his desire to help servicemen began when two of his sons went to war, and he himself was rejected for service, although as a dad he wanted to go. In 1936 he was awarded an OBE, at which time it was stated that the Association had already helped 75,600 men.

Mr Percy Stanhope Hobday (President 1931–1935)

Percy Hobday was born in Brisbane in 1879 and was the son of J P Hobday, an early Queensland artist. Percy also became an artist and primarily focused on landscapes and monotypes. He exhibited with the Queensland Art Society for 50 years from 1901 and served continuously on their committee from 1922 to 1947. While President of both the League and the Royal Queensland Art Society, Percy encouraged the Society to run a stall on Wattle Day 1932 to boost collections for a new scholarship. Daphne Mayo herself convened the group of women running the stall. After his death, his wife provided a bequest for the 'Hobday and Hingston Bursary' at the Queensland Art Gallery.

Brisbane between the wars

As well as the construction of City Hall, the period between the First and Second World Wars saw the development of some key city landmarks including the Story, William Jolly and Walter Taylor Bridges.

This period saw local government amalgamation to form Greater Brisbane Council and significant increases in population. Although growing, Brisbane was not expanding as quickly as Sydney or Melbourne and was seen mostly as a port and administrative centre for the State. Manufacturing did feature in the economy, but it was rural production and mining that was most prominent. Huge amounts of wool, beef, sugar and wheat were produced and exported.

The city was expanding outwards. Queenslanders and cheaper tin bungalows were still the dominant style, but newer brick and fibro constructions were gaining in popularity. City suburbanisation was aided by the effective tram network. Perhaps as a result of the financial depression, interest in apartments grew in the 1930s. Kangaroo Point and Highgate Hill amongst other areas saw a growing number of this type of dwelling.

As Mayor between 1925–1931, William Jolly was influential in developing the road system to take account of increasing car ownership, drainage improvements, purchase of parklands and the construction of the Grey Street Bridge (subsequently renamed in his honour).

He was largely responsible for the establishment of the Victoria Park Golf Club which was built on land freed by the decision to build the University at St Lucia.

Changing times for the Wattle League

After success with scholarships and wartime fundraising, the League faced more difficult times from the mid-1920s. Lack of collectors and poor economic conditions saw Wattle Day collections decline, and by 1930 it was being suggested the street collections should be stopped. In fact, the collections did continue for a while longer, finally ending in 1938, when it was decided to rely on schools income and other donations.

The outbreak of the Second World War in 1939 could not fail to impact on the work of the League. Money was donated to relief agencies but the fundraising heights of World War One were not to be repeated. By that time, the active League membership had dwindled and many were advanced in years.

The League used remaining funds to continue to provide scholarships at Queensland Technical College. In order to ensure the continuation of the scholarships, the League approached another organisation – the recently formed Half Dozen Group of Artists. The artists group agreed to carry on awarding the scholarships using nearly £400 of League money.

This period could easily have been the end of the Queensland League. In some ways, it had run its course – wattle was firmly established in the hearts and minds of Australians, support for the arts was developing and other organisations were supporting the needs of soldiers injured in World War Two.

Fortunately, however, the achievements of the Queensland Wattle Day League were not forgotten and the baton was soon handed to a new generation.

In the following years, the number of active members began to decline.

Mrs Papi on the left (front) passed away in November 1925. Mr Godfrey Rivers, a founding member and tutor of Daphne Mayo passed away in February that year and Mrs Marchant died unexpectedly in December 1925. In 1928, the sitting Chairperson of the League, Maurice Baldwin (pictured in the front row) also died. The loss of so many key members undoubtedly had an impact on the organisation.

World War Two in Brisbane

Brisbane played a vital role in World War Two as the conflict spread throughout the Pacific region. Shortly after American entry to the war, US forces began arriving in Brisbane. The first convoy's troops in December 1941 were billeted at Eagle Farm. Soon, Sandgate, Petrie and Strathpine housed major air force bases and warships and submarines occupied the Brisbane River at New Farm.

City offices and university buildings at St Lucia became military headquarters. Private homes, schools and other buildings were taken over for military use. Brisbane became the Headquarters of General Douglas MacArthur, Commander of the forces in the region. He occupied the AMP building (now MacArthur Chambers) and lived in apartments on the top floor of Lennon's Hotel on George Street. The city was a staging post for troops moving North and an estimated two million passed through at a time when the population was little over 300,000.

The strains on the city were significant, especially in terms of transport, accommodation and food supplies. The better pay and rations of the Americans, and their success with Australian ladies, led to huge tensions. This culminated in the infamous two day Battle of Brisbane, when locals, Australian soldiers and US troops clashed. The fighting resulted in the death of an Australian soldier, although the event was heavily censored by authorities.

Post-war Wattle League

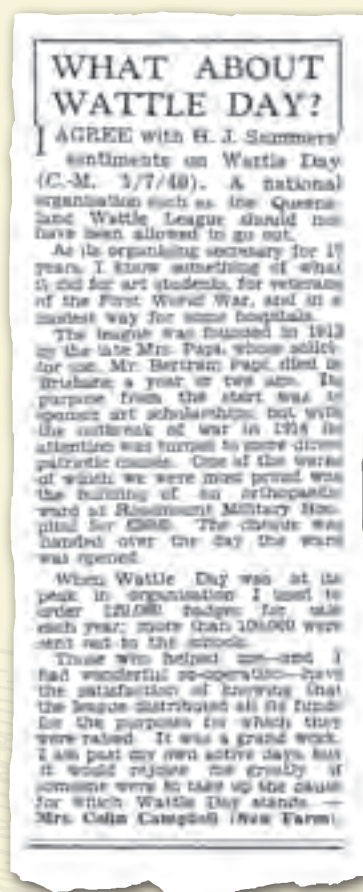

Although the scholarship continued to be awarded by the Half Dozen Group of Artists, the wider aims of the League in terms of social welfare or promotion of wattle were not continued when the war ended. This prompted retired Secretary of the League, Mrs Campbell, to write a letter to the Courier Mail in 1949 highlighting the good work done by the League in the past. Pressure like this paid off, and in 1952, Miss Doris Thain sponsored the formation of a committee to re-establish the League.

Thain was concerned with the welfare of disabled people , and worked with Josephine Hickey (who had previously been a resident of Montrose Home for Crippled Children) to revive the League. It was proposed that the new League would focus on the needs of “handicapped people”.

The League was formally reconstituted at a meeting on 29 September 1954, and quickly received many calls for advice and assistance. However, problems with the constitution brought the League to a temporary halt in November 1955. A revised constitution proved more robust, and the only further change came in 1965, when it was decided to change the name of the Queensland Wattle League to add the words “for the disabled”.

Initially, it was hoped to build a “home” to plug a gap in provision which saw very limited options for handicapped people once they reached the age of 16 and left facilities like the Montrose Home. These plans changed over time and the League instead set up a sheltered workshop to provide employment.

Finance was a dominant issue. Approaches were made for government funding but these were not successful leaving the League reliant on money from board members and other donations.

Letter from Mrs Campbell,
Courier Mail, 5 July 1949

An early success came in 1959 when the League played a central role in the formation of a peak body for the sector in Queensland. Queensland Council of Social Service (QCOSS) remains an important part of the Queensland social service landscape to this day.

She cooks from a wheelchair

FAIR-HAIRED Miss Josephine Hickey helped to cook dinner for nine last night at home.

She has recently been the recipient of letters from all parts of the world, and has been asked to give a lecture on her own experiences.

Miss Hickey started working at home in 1947, and has since then been able to make a living for herself and her family.

She is now 35, and has been married for 10 years.

She is a member of the Queensland Wattle League, and has been elected to the position of President.

Josephine Hickey.

Everything in the kitchen is done for Josephine Hickey. For 11 years she has been working as a cook and now she gets her own wages to go to the bank.

She runs all the affairs of the home besides doing the cooking, and finds time for her own interests.

Nursing, too

She has been working as a nurse for 11 years, and is now in charge of the nursing department at the hospital.

She is a member of the Queensland Wattle League, and has been elected to the position of President.

One of Miss Hickey's latest activities is with the new Old Mother's Association, which is now in the process of being established.

The aim of the League is to help handicapped people throughout Queensland.

And as Miss Hickey herself has a son, she knows what it is like to have a child who is handicapped.

She has a son, and a daughter, and a brother-in-law, and she has a very happy home.

In its Annual Report of 1961-62, the Board underlines its vision for the future, arguing:

"The Board has emphasised that the transformation of disabled people from a state of dependency to a state of activity and productivity has a most important effect on the economic soundness of the country. When disabled people are neglected they constitute both a weakness in the social structure and a large drain on the economy. No country can make true progress unless its progress is shared by all its people and a sound economy is not possible when the productive efforts of one part of the community must be used to maintain another portion that is potentially productive."

The Association was established on August 18, 1956, and is registered under "The Companies Act of 1961" and "The Charitable Collections Act of 1952", Queensland.

The objects of the Association are:

- To establish and conduct an Association comprising physically handicapped people and friends for the purpose of the welfare and happiness of physically handicapped people.
- To take action for the discovery, treatment, care, education, training, recreation and placement and generally to promote the welfare of physically handicapped people.
- To investigate and develop means whereby within the limits of their ability physically handicapped people may support themselves and make their contribution to the economic and social life of the community.
- To provide training centres, workshops, industries, home industries, sales services, clinics, home care service, homes, holiday homes and facilities for physically handicapped people.
- To alleviate the loneliness of friendless sufferers and to bring those who need advice and assistance into contact with available sources of help.
- To arouse the social conscience of the community on the problems and requirements of physically handicapped people.
- To co-operate with or to complement the work of any organisation having objects not contrary to those of the Association.
- To do all such things as may be conducive to the welfare and happiness of physically handicapped people.

Membership:

The Association invites application for membership from any physically handicapped person and from any person interested in the welfare of the physically handicapped.

Employ The Handicapped - It's Good Business.

Membership was largely made up of handicapped people and their carers – Josephine Hickey was named as President of the provisional Committee that re-established the League in 1952. The League also sought to challenge preconceptions about disabled people being helpless.

Post-war Brisbane

Money was scarce in the immediate post-war period, yet it was a time when Brisbane was in much need of investment. Some roads remained unsealed, many homes still relied on rain water and outhouses were still in use as the sewage system struggled to keep up with city growth.

Priority was first given to the construction of Tennyson Powerhouse and upgrading the power station in New Farm Park to meet the growing electricity demand. Over time, the city skyline began to change, and in 1960, Brisbane's first modern apartment block, Torbreck, was completed at Highgate Hill.

Development accelerated with the election of Clem Jones as Lord Mayor in 1961 and it was the transport network that showed the most visible change. One of the largest fires in Brisbane history in September 1962 destroyed the Paddington tram depot and hastened the demise of the tram network as some routes had to be switched to buses.

Construction of the Riverside Expressway began in 1968 as part of a master plan for city transport. That plan dealt the final blow to the tram network and originally envisaged closure of most of the suburban railway lines and an extended freeway network that would have seen much of Woolloongabba disappear to make way for road interchanges.

4. The huge fire at the Paddington tram depot in September 1962 destroyed 65 trams – at least a fifth of the total tram stock. The depot was on the side of a hill and supported by a large number of timber supports. A few trams were saved before the power cut out, but as the fire raged, many trams crashed to the ground through the floor.

Neither the trams nor the depot were insured. Older trams were brought back into service but a number of routes were converted to diesel buses. The perceived greater flexibility of buses and the loss of so many trams helped justify the final closure of the tram system on 13 April 1969.

The depot site was cleared and is now the site of "Paddington Central" shopping centre.

The Wattle League Workshop

The work of the 'new' League formed in 1952 came to be dominated by the establishment and running of a sheltered workshop. Ahead of their time, the Wattle League saw employment as the best long term solution to the difficulties faced by their disabled members.

The search for suitable premises took some time, but in April 1962 a workshop was opened in part of a store building in the Roma Street Railway Yard, entered from Countess Street. They quickly moved to another nearby Queensland Rail facility accessed from College Road in 1964.

Workshop tasks included wood and metal work, manufacture of items such as toys and commercial typing, collation and duplication. The later years of the 1960s saw a gradual increase in the numbers of workshop attendees and this period also saw some workshop staff working onsite with a mattress manufacturing company (Queensland Springs at Hocking Street, South Brisbane).

Successful applications for government subsidies in the 1970s allowed much needed investment in the physical set up and in the training and wages of the workers. Partly as a result of the grants, some changes were made to the workshops. Hockings Street remained as a Sheltered Workshop, while College Road became an Activity Therapy Centre (ATC). In essence, the Sheltered Workshop was more employment-focussed, while the Activity Centre had more emphasis on social, recreational and therapy programmes.

The workshop at Queensland Springs continued throughout the 1970s, but closed its doors at the end of 1980. The Activity Therapy Centre changed and developed over the years. It eventually became a "small business" in 1991 after Government funding ended and the League decided to maintain a service for clients who could not sustain mainstream employment.

Walking aids developed as a key product line following an initial enquiry by the Geriatric Unit of the Princess Alexandra Hospital. Hundreds were manufactured and sold over the years.

The Wattle League Workshop

The small business that developed from the Activity Therapy Centre specialised in services for business – such as processing monthly statements, invoices and promotional literature.

In 2001 the small business adopted the name “Stuff it” before the service was transferred to another company (Work Solutions) in 2004.

Roma Street

The Roma Street area has been important to the city for many years and it is believed that prior to European arrival, Aboriginal people had used the land for meetings and ceremonies.

Before the current parkland was created, the area and surroundings had been home to a railway goods yard, an orphanage, a power station, gas works, markets and the original site of Brisbane Grammar School. During World War Two, air raid shelters were built in what is now the Upper Parkland.

When rail freight handling moved to Acacia Ridge in 1991, Roma Street Station was redeveloped, and a large portion of the Roma Street yards was no longer required. That land was integrated with the existing Albert Park, and Roma Street Parkland opened in 2001.

The people behind the League

The Cilento family

A number of members of the prominent Brisbane Cilento family have been involved with the Wattle League over the years. Lady Cilento was appointed as patron in 1958 and two of her children also enjoyed an association with the League.

Prior to being appointed as patron, her daughter, Margaret Cilento, won the 1947 Wattle League art scholarship during the time the scholarships were being organised by the Half Dozen Group of Artists. Margaret went on to have a notable artistic career. Later, her son, Dr David Cilento, was a member of the Wattle League board from 1976 to 1978, serving as President in his final year.

During the course of our research, we made contact with another of Lady Cilento's daughters, Dr Ruth Cilento. She told us:

"The League was a tower of strength to many people in the early Queensland history since there were no social services in those days. My sister Margaret Cilento who became a well known artist, received a bursary from the League after the war, to continue her studies.

My mother Lady Cilento who was a patron of the League for some years was also a philanthropist in the medical and sociology fields all through her long life ... I am delighted that Open Minds is continuing the ethos of care for those in need."

Lady Phyllis Cilento

The people behind the League

Doris and George Thain

Doris Thain was the driving force behind the re-establishment of the League in 1952 and served as President and Secretary, a post she held at the time of her death in 1962.

Her brother, William George Thain was also a very important figure in the League as Secretary and Treasurer, before becoming Chairman between 1961 and 1975. He provided significant financial assistance to the League in the early years through cash loans and donations. He also lent office space and equipment, and continued to be involved with the organisation right up to his death in 1979. George's wife (Jean) was also a Board member.

Mrs Blackman

Mrs Blackman's husband Jim was an ex-serviceman who unfortunately suffered a heart attack in 1968. During his recovery he attended the League workshop from 1970. She recalls her husband enjoying the League and particularly liked the feeling of "going to work".

Mrs Blackman joined the board in 1976, becoming Chairman in 1979. She helped keep the organisation going during a difficult financial time.

Madeline Cottee

As Chairman for much of the 1980s, Mrs Cottee steered the organisation through challenges that could easily have seen the League fold. Those who remember her at the time describe her energetic fundraising, which ranged from selling cakes to making approaches to government bodies. She also spent many hours each week at the League with clients, families and staff.

Sadly, Mrs Cottee passed away during the writing of this document, but speaking in a 2010 interview, she downplayed the role she played in revitalising the organisation, merely commenting she was: "doing a necessary job that happened sometimes to work."

The people behind the League

Three generations of the Stewart family

The Stewart family are unique in our history in having an involvement that spans three generations.

Ted Stewart convened the organisation between 1989 and 2009. His father Sir Edward Stewart was patron of the Wattle League for over 25 years and Ted's grandfather arranged for meals to be supplied to Wattle Day collectors at the Criterion Hotel in 1916.

Ted's father, Sir Edward, was a prominent and successful Brisbane businessman. At various times, he owned or operated the Criterion, the Albion, the Hamilton and the Highway Hotel at Rocklea, where Queensland's first drive-through bottle shop was developed. Sir Edward also expanded their catering operations, handling catering at Eagle Farm racecourse, and the beverages at the 1982 Commonwealth Games. He received a knighthood for services to his industry and the community at Buckingham Palace in 1980.

His period as patron overlapped with his son, Ted, becoming a board member of the League. Ted was appointed a Director in November 1986 and assumed the Chairmanship in 1989. During his 20 years as Chair, the organisation underwent the most dramatic changes in its history, with a change in name, new headquarters, and a massive growth in the range and number of services offered.

Ted remains closely involved with the family business that still involves hospitality and property investment.

Ted Stewart meets Susan Papi – the wife of the late Adrian Papi, the grandson of League founder Josephine Papi.

The people behind the League

Pat Keating

Pat Keating is 79 years old and as a long standing recipient of our services, he knows more about the Wattle League than most of the current staff!

Pat started coming to the Wattle League in the 1970s, when his father was sick in hospital, and social workers who became involved with the family suggested Pat would benefit from attending the workshop run by the League.

Pat recalls:

"I started in 1972 at the sheltered workshop at Normanby, across the road from the Grammar. We used to make pegs, pack screws, do bits of paperwork like folding road safety leaflets. The workshop was in old railway huts at the back of Roma Street Station. The Walkers were running the place and then we got a new Manager, Mr Hawkins. He helped get some government money for the League."

Pat has an amazing memory for his work colleagues and some of the people who ran the League. He remembers board member Mrs Blackman getting involved with the League:

"I worked with Jimmy, Mrs Blackman's husband. Then she went onto the Board and got her friend Mrs Cottee involved as well."

He also remembers some of the changes that happened over the years:

"There was another workshop for a while at Hockings Street. They did heavier work like making springs and walking aids."

When asked what kept him going to the League all these years, Pat says he enjoyed attending and added:

"I met all types of people which was very interesting."

Pat worked for nearly 30 years until his retirement, and now lives in a nursing home. He still receives support from Open Minds, maintaining a relationship that stretches over 40 years of our history.

Pat's story merely gives a flavour of the many, many clients and family members who have and continue to play a vital role in the running of the organisation.

The League in the 1970s - first Government support

The 1970s started positively for the League, with the offices and workshop working at full capacity and finances stable. New opportunities came in the form of grants from government and by 1974, the first money had been received and helped cover rent, wages, equipment and training fees.

The subsidies received for the workshop activity allowed a closer focus on future development of the League, and a 'building fund' was established to help secure better premises. In the meantime, a warehouse building in South Brisbane was rented, and the organisation moved the Activity Therapy Centre there in 1975.

The work of the Therapy Centre continued to grow and develop as skills programmes became more established. An Occupational Therapist was hired, and classes were organised in a wide variety of subjects from sewing and cooking, to caring for pets.

The late 1970s were more difficult, as the poor economic conditions of the time and increases in rent ate into reserves. The League engaged a fundraiser and tried a wide range of activities to bring money in to the organisation. Client outings and activities continued though, and a commemorative wattle grove planting received television coverage during Wattle Week in 1979.

The image shows three vertical spines of old, worn books. The spines are made of a light brown, textured material, possibly leather or cloth, and are bound with dark red or maroon leather. Each spine has a central label with the words "MINUTE BOOK" in white, serif, capital letters. The labels are framed by thin, horizontal lines. The books are slightly aged and show signs of wear, with some discoloration and fraying at the edges. The first spine on the left has a small, dark mark near the bottom. The middle spine has a large, dark number "2" near the bottom. The right spine has a large, dark number "3" near the bottom.

1970s Brisbane

The 1970s were a time of huge change in the city. The skyline changed as the city grew upwards, and a number of historic buildings were demolished in the name of progress. With Joh Bjelke-Petersen at the helm in State Government, Brisbane saw largely unchecked growth and rising political tension.

Tragedy also struck in the form of the 1973 Whiskey Au Go Go fire, where 15 people died, and the 1974 floods when 14 perished.

The Whiskey Au Go Go fire in Fortitude Valley killed 15 people in the early hours of Thursday 8 March 1973. Two drums of diesel fuel were deliberately ignited, and grease was said to have been spread over the rear fire escape. Two men were arrested and subsequently convicted, the jury believing the fire was lit as part of an extortion campaign.

January 1974 saw the worst flooding in the city during the 20th century, as continual, heavy rain fell for three weeks. On top of this came tropical cyclone “Wanda”, which hit north of Brisbane on 24 January and deposited enormous quantities of water during the Australia Day weekend.

The floods peaked at 6.6 metres and nearly 7,000 homes were inundated. 14 people lost their lives.

Flooding in CBD taken from Holman Street – note the cranes as the city grows upwards but also City Hall still just visible. There is also a wharf remaining on the riverfront before the Pacific Motorway was completed.

The demolition of the Bellevue Hotel in 1979 was symbolic of the Bjelke-Petersen Government approach to progress. The National Trust urged the retention of the 1880s three-storey Hotel on the corner of George and Alice streets and opposite Parliament House. Famous guests had included Frank Sinatra, Katharine Hepburn, Nat ‘King’ Cole and Louis Armstrong.

Just three days after cabinet approval for demolition, bulldozers moved in at night to completely demolish the hotel despite a growing crowd of protesters.

The Government argued at the time that the cost of renovating the building was simply too high. The same approach and the same demolition company would go on to tear down the Cloudland Ballroom at Bowen Hills in 1982.

Wattle League survival and growth

There is no doubt that the start of the 1980s saw the League at a low point, and the long term viability of the organisation was in serious doubt.

The League effectively retrenched to survive, and the Sheltered Workshop at Queensland Springs closed in 1980. The lack of sufficient government funding or donations for the workshop meant it was not viable. Payment of wages was suspended in March 1982, and the League ran without a General Manager for a time.

In 1983, Mrs Madeline Cottee was elected as Chairman – she proved to be a vital figure in securing the future of the League. Mrs Cottee worked tirelessly to highlight the needs of the organisation, encourage donations and build relations with government.

Around the same time, a new fundraiser, Warren Tapp, was appointed. He organised a fundraising dinner at City Hall with comedian, actor and writer, Campbell McComas. This event gives a significant boost to the finances.

The work of the Activity Therapy Centre continued throughout this time, using a programme of training, education, basic living skills and recreation. Despite the difficulties being faced by the League, it was this type of work, and the experience gained, that laid the foundations for much of what Open Minds does today.

In the later years of the 1980s, the Disability Services Act brought new funding but also required changes to the Activity Therapy Centre as discussed earlier.

So, despite all of the challenges, by the end of the 1980s and the end of Mrs Cottee's Chairmanship, the finances of the League had been transformed and it was able to report a significant surplus.

Chairman's AGM address 1980:

"...the affairs of the Association continue to be governed by our inability to accumulate adequate funds."

Although Madeline Cottee (right) stepped down as Chairman in 1989, she remained involved with the League for many years after. Here she is pictured with former Queensland Premier Anna Bligh at the Earle Duus Awards ceremony in 2001.

The world comes to Brisbane

Just as the 1980s saw a slow transformation in the fortunes of the Wattle League, the decade can also be seen as the era that Brisbane really came of age as a global city. The Commonwealth Games in 1982 and the World Expo in 1988 attracted millions of visitors and acted as a catalyst for development.

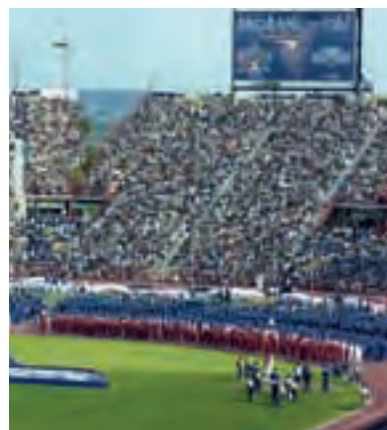

The mascot for the games was Matilda the kangaroo. A giant mechanical Matilda was pulled around the stadium at the opening ceremony winking at the crowd. After the Games she moved to Wet 'n' Wild and was exhibited there until recently. She now resides near Kybong beside a service station that shares her name!

The South Bank site was largely derelict before Expo after years of industrial use. Large sails were erected to protect visitors from the sun, a monorail was built to transport visitors around the site and the 88 metre skyneedle was constructed. Around 100 pavilions represented many nations and regions, while corporate presences included IBM and Ford.

The most visible legacy of Expo 88 is the South Bank Parklands, which were constructed on the site after the event. The Parklands include the Peace Pagoda, which was part of the Nepalese presence, and the River Stage and Suncorp Piazza, which were Expo performing arts venues.

The Commonwealth Games brought 45 Commonwealth nations to Brisbane. QEII Stadium hosted the opening ceremony as well as the athletics and archery competitions. Other events were held at the Sleeman Sports Complex in Chandler, while the Bruce Highway was used for cycling. Griffith University campus was the athlete's village.

World Expo 88 was held between April and October, with the theme “Leisure in the Age of Technology”. It was part of bicentennial celebrations and attracted over 15 million visitors.

Becoming Open Minds

The Queensland Wattle League started the 1990s in a far stronger position than the start of the previous decade. By this stage, the League was already developing the expertise and services that are recognisable in Open Minds today.

In particular, the move away from running a workshop toward supporting individual clients to find and maintain work was very important. So too, was the growth in managing accommodation and housing support. Not only did this shape future Wattle League employment and support services, these new services also gave the League experience that would be vital when the Project 300 (P300) programme was created.

P300 aimed to assist a target number of 300 people from Queensland psychiatric hospitals to live independently. By 2000, the Wattle League P300 service had grown to support over 40 clients in the transition to independent living. This growth continued and in 2012, Open Minds is the largest P300 service provider in Queensland.

Around the same time as the start of P300 (1996), the Wattle League was notified of a legacy from the estate of Mr Earle Duus. Using some of the money, an award scheme in Duus' name was created that is still awarded during Mental Health Week.

Over time, the League identified itself more and more as a body specialising in mental health. This culminated in the name change to Open Minds in 2003. The name was seen as summing up the approach and outlook of the organisation.

In 2002, a redeveloped Chester Road block is opened. The land was donated by Council and the building costs met by the League.

One hundred years in perspective

There are not many Australian organisations that can claim one hundred years of service. The fact that Open Minds thrives today is a testament to the organisation's resilience and ability to reinvent itself as times change.

The long list of services now provided by Open Minds would be unrecognisable to the founders of the Wattle League. However, many of the principles that underpin the work would strike a chord, and the slogan 'people supporting people' could be applied to the work of the League during the First World War just as readily as it applies to the work of Open Minds today. In fact, the history is really all about people and their commitment to a better life for fellow citizens.

In the early years, the Queensland Wattle League responded to needs of people affected by war. The reformed Wattle League for the Disabled in the 1950s focused on disability of all types, and led the way in providing meaningful work for those who found it difficult to gain employment elsewhere. The Activity Therapy Centre founded in the 1970s undoubtedly provided a sense of belonging for those who attended. The experience gained led Open Minds to its clear focus on mental health and the services it operates today.

Along the way, the organisation helped launch some very successful artistic careers through scholarships. The careers of both Daphne Mayo and Robert Cummings were launched with the support of the League, and many others benefited from the later scholarships provided with the Technical College.

Reading through the history of the Wattle League also shows the contribution made by some remarkable women – from founder, Mrs Papi, and long-time secretary, Mrs Campbell, to Mrs Cottee who turned the organisation around in the 1980s.

We also see the dedication and determination of Doris Thain to revive the Wattle League in the fifties.

Many others could be mentioned, and it should not be forgotten that families and carers have played a central role in the activities of the organisation across its history – as board members, as volunteers and as funders.

This has been a fascinating project to work on, and I am proud to have been able to research, write and present this publication as a summary of the first hundred years of an amazing Brisbane organisation.
